

Behaviour is often the rate-limiting step preventing potentially effective interventions having a positive impact on peoples' health. This theme applies behavioural science to develop and implement interventions that make healthcare more effective, appropriate, accessible and efficient. It does this by examining ways to optimise behaviour at the patient, professional and organisational levels across a variety of long term conditions.

Watch a short film introducing this CLAHRC research theme featuring Theme Lead Professor Rob Horne